While at School

Mohandas was a mediocre student while studying at a school in Rajkot. It was with some difficulty that he got through the multiplication tables. His handwriting was not so good and much later when he realized that good handwriting was a necessary part of education, he repented that neglect and tried to improve it, but in vain.

Mohandas could not spell well and his ability was put to test one day when an educational inspector came on a visit to the school. He gave a dictation of five words to students. Mohandas could not get the correct spelling of the word 'kettle'. His teacher was anxious that everybody in his class should get all the words of dictation right during the inspection. He tried to prompt Mohandas with the point of his boot. But it was beyond the boy to see that the teacher wanted him to copy the spelling from his neighbours' slate. The result was that all boys, except Mohandas, were found to have spelt every word correctly.

He was painfully shy and avoided all company; his books and his lessons were his sole companions. His shyness was one of the reasons for his neglect of physical exercise. To be at school at the stroke of the hour and to run back as soon as the school closed was his daily habit. He enjoyed the affection of his teachers, and the certificate of progress and character sent to his parents every year were always good. He used to be astonished whenever he win prizes. He jealously guarded his character. The least little blemish was unbearable to him.

When he was young, he had such low self-esteem that he seldom interacted with his classmates for fear of being ridiculed. It was impossible for him to speak impromptu. He hesitated whenever he had to face strange audience, and avoided making speeches in public. He tried to overcome his shyness but each time he tried to make as speech, he ended up making a fool of himself. Very often he couldn't go beyond the first sentence. His memory would fail him and he would abruptly stop the speech. Once he tried to read out his speech, but his vision became blurred and he trembled with fear , and another speaker had to read it out for him.
